The camera in your Android phone likely packs at least 6 megapixels into each shot—but if you don't apply a little know-how to your photography, your images can look as bad as those from a classic 640-by-480-pixel camera phone. In this article I'll detail eight tips to get great photos from an Android camera phone. You'll be able to take better shots at night, keep the background consistently sharp, and ensure the results can beat photos from a stand-alone point-and-shoot camera, so get your picture frames ready. What camera hardware and software you have access to depends on your phone model. I shot images with a Motorola Droid X from Verizon for this article; other handsets might not have the same features. Keep in mind, too, that your version of Android can be the biggest factor. Froyo (Android 2.2) wasn't yet available for me to test on the Droid X (although you can get it unofficially). Depending on your phone hardware, the software update may unlock more manual controls that can help with advanced photography. Be sure to keep your phone updated, and poke around in the camera settings to see what features are available. Without flashWhy use a flash during the day? In bright situations, the flash isn't your main light source, it's your secret weapon—a fill flash. The light provides a burst to compensate for sharp shadows and underexposure, which are common problems on sunny days. With flashAlthough the flash on the Droid X isn't powerful enough to fill every shadow, activating the flash for daytime portraits helps to improve exposure on the subject's cheeks and in other blown-out areas. Maybe your subject's forehead is bright and the area around the eyes is too dark in the early afternoon, for instance. Camera phones are especially susceptible to setting exposure on the bright areas, which leads to over-darkened shadows. Turn on the flash by toggling through the modes (On, Auto, and Off). The flash punches up details when you're within a few feet, so stay close to your subject. Try using the fill flash with backlit subjects, too. For example, avoid the clichéd sunset photo with a bland, dark subject in front of the colorful sky. Instead, fire the flash to light up the foreground. Tap the ISO setting to rein in an auto setting that's too high (causing noise) or too low (lacking sensitivity). I'm much more sparing with the flash at night. Harsh, flat light can blow out camera-phone images, and weaker flashes might not help enough. Instead, I like to make use of whatever moderate light is available, disable the flash, and ask subjects to hold still. You'll have to hold the camera steady, and turn on the stabilizer in your phone's camera app settings (if available). Admittedly, parts of the image might blur anyway, but you still have other tools to improve night photos taken without the flash. A camera phone's ISO setting mimics film speed on standard cameras, a higher number is supposed to be more sensitive to light. In reality, cranking up the ISO can fill the image with noise—pixelated bits of color that don't belong. Experiment with the setting on your camera phone; on the Droid X, it's under Settings, ISO equivalent sensitivity. I like to turn it up manually to about 400 in dark situations. With digital zoomAt full resolutionCropped from full resolution Your camera phone has fixed optics; it can't magnify the image—and zoom—by moving its lens. Instead, you have a digital zoom, which you should almost never use. A digital zoom merely blows up the pixels instead of capturing finer details. You could produce the same effect on your PC with Photoshop or another image editor later. And that's what you should do instead, you can't un-digital-zoom a captured photo, but you can zoom in to an image later on your PC, cropping out unneeded edges. Want to fill the frame? Walk closer to your subject. If you absolutely can't get closer, such as when you're taking a shot of a reclusive celebrity in the wild, I'd still recommend avoiding the digital zoom and blowing up the area you want on your PC later. Even the cheapest camera phone can capture terrific pictures in ideal lighting. Since you won't be toting your own lights, pay attention to what's available when you're composing shots. In most cases, try to get the light at your back. Reposition yourself or ask subjects to move if you're shooting into the sun. Think about multiple light sources for the best photos. Studios often use a combination of three lights—a key light, a fill light, and a back light—to illuminate scenes. The key light is the brightest, coming from near the camera; meanwhile, a fill light is offset to the side to soften shadows, and a back light sits far to the side or behind the subject to add a sense of depth. Follow similar conventions when you can. Maybe an indoor, afternoon shot could use windows as the key and fill lights, and a lamp as a back light. Just avoid having bright light sources in the image, since the camera phone will end up setting exposure on that point. Toggle to the Sport setting to increase the shutter speed. Taking too many blurry photos? Either your camera is moving too much or your subject is. The former produces a picture that's completely blurred, while the latter creates a picture with some sharp elements but a blurred subject. Here's how to fix the problem. To reduce camera movement, stay still when firing the lens. Hold the camera phone with both hands, and keep your elbows tucked in to the sides of your body for support. Press the shutter button, but make no other movements—such as lifting your finger—until you're sure the image has been taken. On the Droid X, I hold the shutter button down partway to set the focus, and then push it fully to take the shot. I don't lift my finger until after the image is processed. Move your finger early, and you might shake the camera. If you're shooting with ample light, you can keep subjects from blurring by increasing the shutter speed. In most cases, such as on the Droid X, you'll do this by selecting Scenes, Sport, since a camera phone typically doesn't include manual shutter-speed settings. The portrait setting can help reduce the depth of field. Use camera-phone blur to your advantage, bringing attention to your subject while blurring the background. A short depth of field (the distance in which the classic way people create such an effect. You'll need ample light and an Android phone with manual exposure settings for the best results. Set the aperture as low as it can go in your camera app settings' manual mode. If you don't have that manual setting, try putting your camera phone in the Portrait auto-mode if available. (I picked Scenes, Portrait on the Droid X.) Regardless, the effect will be more prominent if you get within a few feet of your subject and stay far from the background. Motion blur can create a different sort of feel, causing blur if either the subject or the camera moves. If they're moving together, however, only the background will blur. Try focusing on a friend as you walk together, keeping the subject in the same position in the frame. Since you're in roughly the same relative position, your friend will stay sharp but the background will blur. This effect works best in darker situations—such as at dusk—when the camera has to extend the shutter speed. As an alternative, create a lot of background movement, such as by shooting from a moving car. Camera Zoom FX lets you set several timer options so that everyone can stay in the picture. You can capture great photos with the built-in camera app, but add-on apps can enable even more features. In choosing such an app, I looked past the filters and other gimmick apps to tools that add timer functions, something the default Droid X camera lacks. Camera Zoom FX offers several effects, but right now you want the timer tool. For a group shot, prop up your phone where it can see everyone, and then go to Quick Settings, Settings 3, Timer to enable the timer. Add the burst mode to take a series of shots at once, it's easier than walking back and forth to repeat. Just go to Quick Settings, Settings 3, Burst Mode. Many photos have a camera-phone look not because of the hardware but because of the typical camera-phone angle: eye level, far from the subject. To get the best photos, shoot from unique perspectives. Try getting down to kid-height to record children playing, or try capturing a group shot from a low angle after your team conquers a mountain. Perhaps most important, get close to your subject. Experiment with all of these tips to get familiar with your own Android camera phone. With a bit of practice, you can develop the technical and artistic skills to snap great photos in spite of the fixed, cheap lens. It's that time of year again when you're working your smartphone overtime attempting to keep up with all of the memories of holiday parties, family gatherings, and pets you've wrangled into festive attire. If you're working with any of the latest Android phones, including the Google Pixel 3 or Samsung Note9, then one of the best cameras on the market is already in your pocket. But regardless of the prowess of your high-end smartphone, merely pointing and shooting at the scene is not the way to capture lasting memories. The same rules apply to smartphone photography as they do studio photography: a little staging goes a long way. Take a beat before hitting the shutter button and employ one or more of the same tips to help make your smartphone-snapped photos look their best. Hold still! You've heard this before, but it bears repeating because it makes an incredible difference: make sure the camera is still when you're shooting a photo. I can't tell you how many times I've snapped and walked to keep up with a group or something of the sort, only to be disappointed later on by blurry results. Your Android phone may be fast at starting up the camera app (double-press the power button on most to instantly fire it up), but it can't make up the photo if you aren't still while taking it. It's always a good idea to get into the habit of checking on what you just snapped before moving on. You don't necessarily need a tripod in this day and age to take a still photo, though it certainly helps elicit the best results. My favorite is the dual-purpose Huawei Tripod Selfie Stick. There are also smartphone camera mounts for standard-sized tripods if you're already tricked out in camera gear. Alternately, specialized products like the Joby GripTight One GP Stand are great for capturing group photos. Leaning the phone against a wall or an object is also another trick of the trade when you're in a bind. Don't be afraid to use an app! Android apps are indeed powerful enough to handle processing RAW photo files produced by DSLRs, so many of them can surely handle editing a photo taken by a smartphone. Free apps like Snapseed, Polarr, and Adobe Lightroom will appeal to tinkers and those who consider themselves the "family photographer." For those who prefer the look of filtered photos, apps like VSCO offer over 100 kinds of millennial-colored flair, as well as A Color Story, which has some of the best filters for presenting to an Instagram audience. Both apps are free to use, though they offer in-app purchases to unlock some of the more popular aesthetics. If you'd rather not pay much to make your photos looked aged, KujiiCam is unapologetically fun to use, and your digital photos will look like they were taken in another decade. If you do mess up a picture and the moment has passed, trying an app like TouchRetouch to go in a remove an errant finger in the top corner. Don't forget the editing features your phone does natively. Google Photos comes pre-loaded on nearly every flagship Android device and offers quick editing tools, including a handful of colored photo filters, a crop option, and the ability to edit common elements like the color hue and exposure. (Google Photos also offers automatic backup for your photos and videos, so be sure to take advantage of that, lest you lose all your precious memories the next time your smartphone drowns in a pool.) Samsung and LG's respective gallery apps also offer light editing options along the same lines. If you're feeling cheezy, you might even like some of the digital "stickers" bundled on Samsung's Galaxy and Note smartphones. A little light goes a long way! Like a little sultry lighting. A dozen candles and a few dimmed bulbs are the perfect way to signal to your guests that your abode is a cozy one. This kind of lighting is awful for pictures, however, and even though your phone's maker promised you some of the best low-light photos, lovely gatherings are not the place to test this claim. Don't be afraid to incorporate a little bit of lighting when the scene calls for it. You don't need to buy anything extra; merely take off the top on a nearby lamp or other equivalent and place it in front of your subjects, beside you if you're the shooter. Also, avoid overhead lighting. As much as recessed lighting looks great in person, it's unflattering on camera. (There's a reason Mariah Carey wears sunglasses when she's indoors, where there's often overhead light.) The same grab-a-lamp trick helps diffuse these sorts of lighting situations and makes everyone in the photo look glowing and alive. Your smartphone's flash can do the same in a pinch, though avoid using it as your primary light source, as it can make your party look washed out. Alternately, you can use a friend's smartphone flashlight as a directional light of sorts by shining it at the angle you want people's faces to be lit. It can contribute to some really neat lighting effects. Use "night mode" if you have it! Are you one of the lucky ones to get the Pixel 3's Night Sight update? Be sure you're using it when the situation calls for it, like inside restaurants or faintly-lit historical buildings. The feature is coming soon to older Pixel devices and is available in the default Android camera app, from the same screen where you can switch between panorama mode and the like. On Samsung and LG phones, a similar ability is buried in the "Pro" or "Manual" modes. In this case, you'll have to do a bit of tweaking to the camera settings to get the kind of photo you want. You don't have to be a camera pro to access this, as most manufacturers offer live previews so you can see what the result will look like after a bit of finagling. For best results, leave everything on Auto except for the shutter speed—that's where you'll see the real difference in how much light camera can take in. And of course, don't forget to lean it up against something while the shutter is open or you'll end up with a blurry photo. Use Portrait mode like it's the real deal! Portrait mode is one of those defacto standard features that now comes included with every flagship smartphone. It's like panorama mode, except that you're likely to use it more often because it gives pictures a bit of a high-tech look. You don't have to use it to snap photos of people, either. It works just as well for animals, plants, or any other curious object. My favorite thing to do with Portrait mode, whether I'm taking a selfie or snapping a photo with cousins I haven't seen in over a decade, is to use it against a simple backdrop. A blank wall is perfect for headshots, while a patterned wall adds a bit of flair. I love the faux "studio look" of these sorts of photos, and you can get creative by using the lamp-light trick in a living room. If done right, the result of your Portrait mode could look as preened and polished as if taken on school picture day, and they could even be photos worthy enough to slap onto a bundle of holiday cards in the next year. Keep it clean! Lastly—and indeed the most obvious piece of advice on the list here—don't forget to wipe your camera lens before taking a photo. Your smartphone is perfectly capable at this stage in the game to take a high-resolution picture of the people you love, but it won't matter if the glass is smudged up with face grease and other assorted debris. Even if you have a case on with a camera covering, wipe that part clean on the inside and out to ensure that your photos remain untainted. If your smartphone is your only camera, you should always carry either a microfiber cloth or a pack of screen-cleaning wipes. Buy them in bulk and place them everywhere: in every bag you use and every car you ride in. Pictures are only worth a thousand words if they're discernible, and if you spend upwards of this much on a new phone, then it should produce frame-worthy photos.
